Bradley surges forwards!

The American armoured divisions are gaining ground south of the Contentin peninsular.

The bad weather has finally broken, allowing the idling Operation Cobra to begin in earnest. A ferocious bombing campaign preceded the American advance - devastating the German defenses.

In the days since the operation began, the Americans have made up several kilometers of ground, reaching as far south-west as Coutances, liberating P riers and Lessay along the way.

This series of victories owes thanks to our brave boys still anchored in the area of Caen, having occupied the larger part of the German forces - rendering them unable to reinforce the front against the American tide.

The fighting is still fierce at Verri res Ridge, where German forces are dug in hard. The ridge constitutes a key strategic point - the Germans would be further hard-pressed were they to abandon the position.

The key to the Americans' success lies in the successful simultaneous launch of the two operations by Montgomery and Bradley - a splendid show of solidarity between our nations.

Blackout by Bomber!

An unprecedented number of aircraft took part in the raids on the Cotentin peninsular, almost blocking out the sky.

Exact numbers are sketchy, but best estimations were that over 1500 bombers took part in the preliminary stages of Operation Cobra.

These included American bombers of the B-17 and B-24 variants as well as smaller fighter-bombers.

The sheer number of aircraft involved meant that broad swathes of the sky were obscured for minutes at a time, and a constant drone split the skulls of all those unfortunate enough to find themselves under the path of the numerous squadrons.

Although German casualties are said to be enormous, the command has come under flak for the reports of friendly troops caught in the blast zone.

General Bradley has said to be alarmed at this news, and claims that the bombing runs did not take a path perpendicular to the front line; contrary to his plan of attack.

Nevrtheless, the attacks have enabled the ground troops to push south.

Heat Wave Ravages!

After poor weather beset the commencement of key military operations last week, we are now beset by record high temperatures.

Where torrential rain fell ceaselessly from the skies, we now endure a barrage of heat that has not been seen in this country for nigh on thirty years.

The temperature has left a number of the British public seething; all manner of disruption having been caused - including to workforces, travel, and health.

Opinion is divided however, as we spoke to numerous people who welcomed 'a bit of sunshine'.

"It makes a nice change," one man told us, whilst standing in a gaping pool of his own sweat.
